SHARE: New Illustration Satire and Some Not So New That You May Have Missed Along the Way: (Ten in Total)

Executive Summary • Companion cartoon edition

By Nicholas Bozza | Thorold Election Commentary | October 25, 2026

A SHORT READ: about 2 minutes | 269 body words

Body only. Excludes titles, headings, illustration text, disclaimers, references and sign-offs. Time to view illustrations is additional.

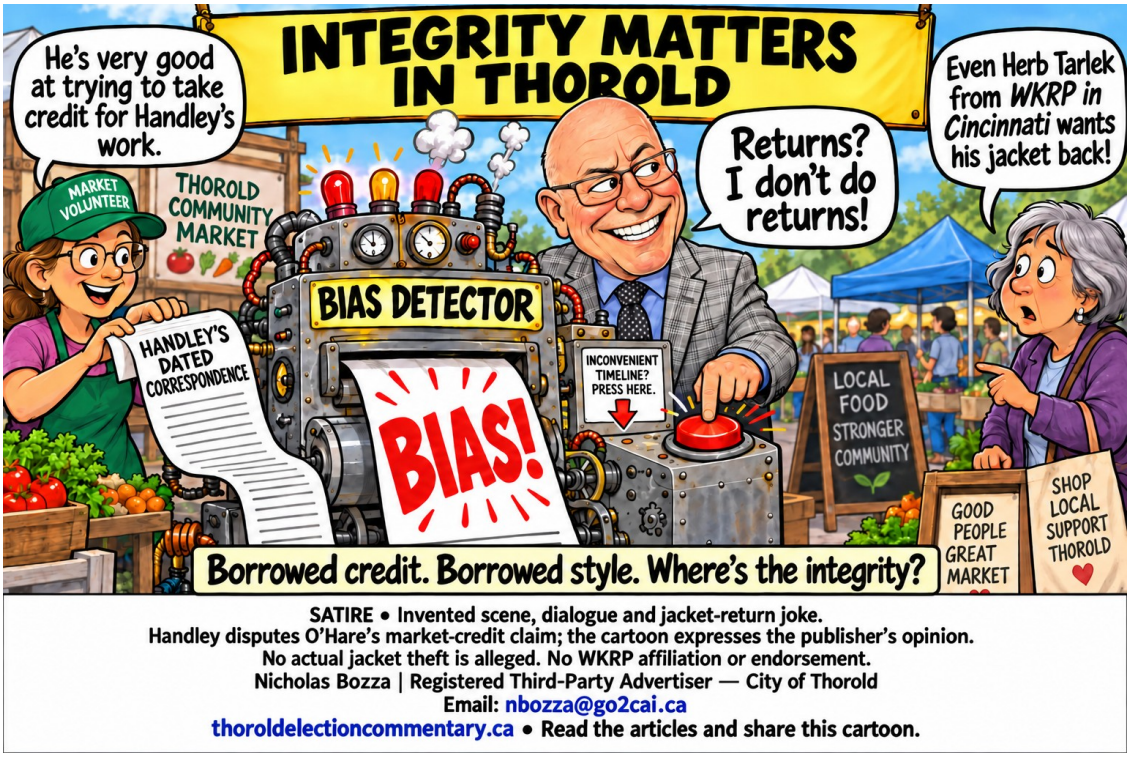

FULL ARTICLE: under 4 minutes. Read my "Twas Day Before Elections" poem and the three full endorsement write-ups with their cartoons. They are short today.

My three personal picks, in no particular order, are Jim Handley, Carm DeRose and Ken Steeve. Read why in the full article, "Twas Day Before Elections: Top 3 Picks".

Please go out of your way to share both editions and the website before election day. Already voted? Help someone else read, ask questions and decide independently.

Integrity Matters in Thorold

Invented bias-detector scene and dialogue. The cartoon expresses the publisher's opinion about disputed credit; it is not an adjudicated finding or a claim of actual jacket theft. No WKRP affiliation or endorsement.

Unapologetic

The circus returns for one more performance. The voters decide whether to renew the booking.

Political satire. Invented circus scene and dialogue. It is a metaphor for the author's criticism, not an actual event or evidence of coordination.

No Deal on a Review

An open briefcase is one thing. A willingness to revisit the deal is another. Read the earlier article for the record behind this satire.

Political satire. The game-show staging and dialogue are invented. The factual vote annotation is separate from the imagined scene. No endorsement by Howie Mandel is implied. No claim of coordination.

To the UN-FAB FOUR — Try This at Home

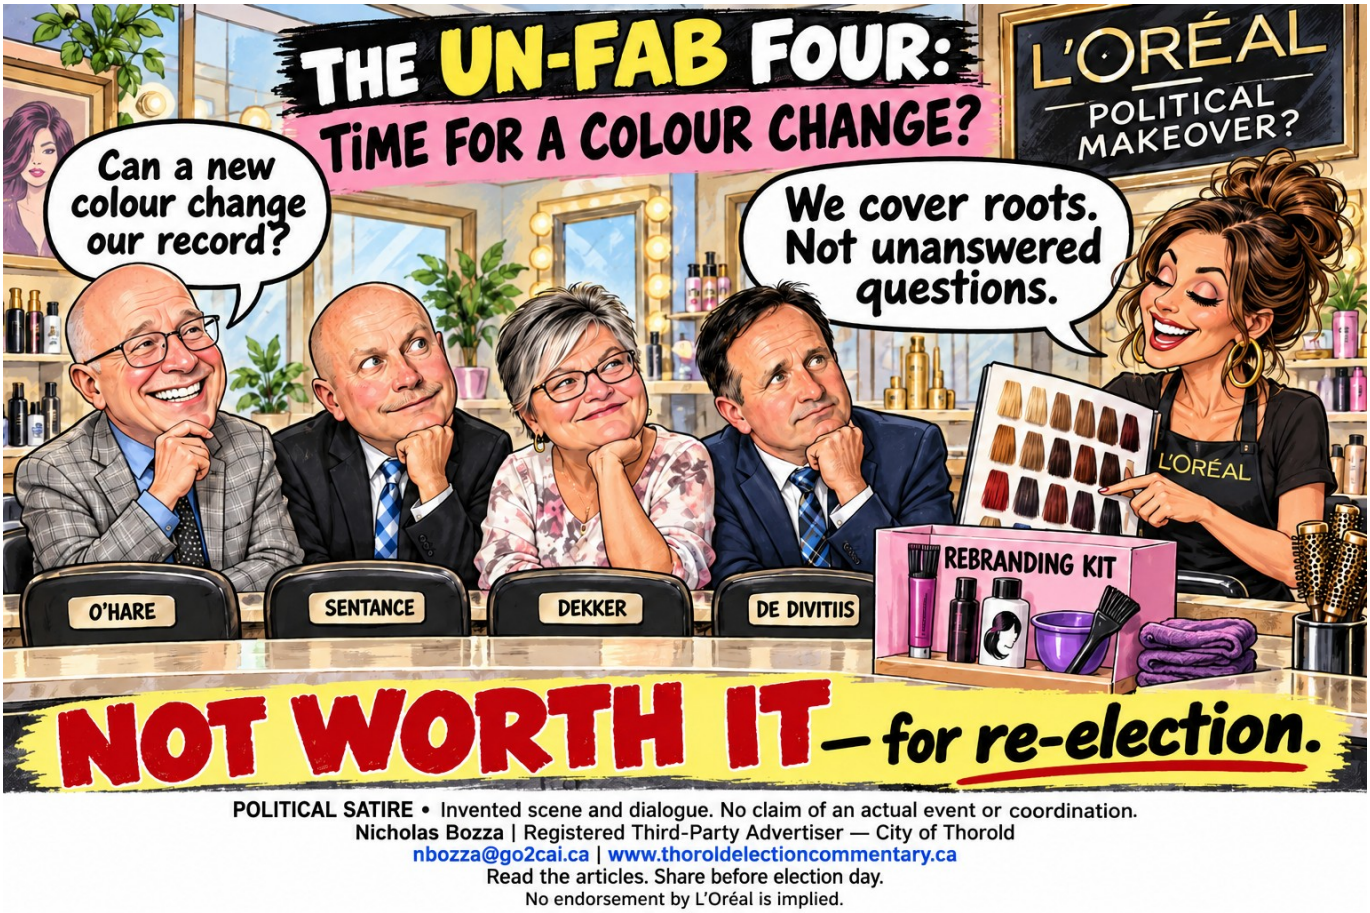

Fictional satire. Imagined scenes and dialogue; not actual family conduct. No endorsement by Howie Mandel or Right Guard.

Political satire. Imagined household scenes and family members, not actual family conduct or quotations. The review dialogue is invented satire. No endorsement by Howie Mandel or Right Guard is implied. No claim of coordination.

Political Makeover

In my opinion, a change of colour cannot substitute for answers about the record.

Political satire. Invented salon scene and dialogue. No endorsement by L'Oréal is implied. No claim of coordination.

The New Clothes

In this fairy tale, a child notices what the grown-ups keep applauding: the explanations appear to be invisible.

Political satire. Fairy-tale parody inspired by The Emperor's New Clothes. The clothing is a metaphor for accountability, not a depiction of actual conduct. No claim of coordination.

Mirror, Mirror, on the Wall

A little vanity, a very large mirror—and an unopened file of questions.

Political satire. Invented magic-mirror scene and dialogue, not actual statements or evidence of coordination.

Order in Council — or Council's Order?

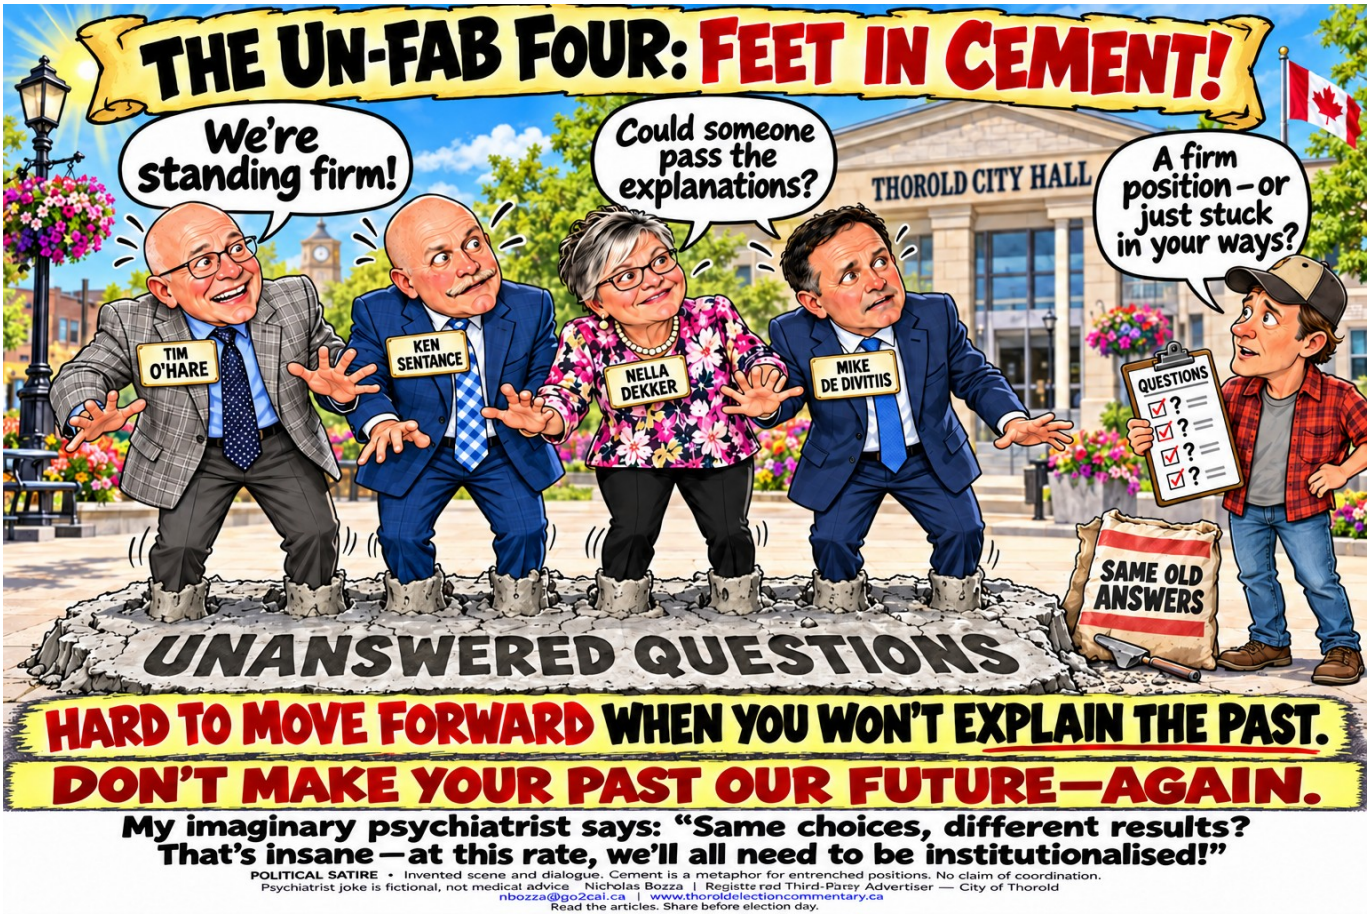

This joke is about council decorum and accountability. The meal orders and the apology line are invented dialogue.

Political satire. This is not a record of an actual meeting or proof of repeated eating incidents. It makes no comment about body size. No endorsement by McDonald's or Coca-Cola is implied. No claim of coordination.

Feet in Cement

Hard to move forward when you won't explain the past. Don't make your past our future—again.

Political satire. Cement is a metaphor for entrenched political positions, not a threat or an actual event. The imaginary psychiatrist and institutionalisation joke are fictional exaggeration, not a diagnosis, recommendation for confinement or medical advice. No claim of coordination.

Before election day, please share this edition and the long form, "Twas Day Before Elections: Top 3 Picks". Encourage readers to examine the articles behind the cartoons and make up their own minds.

General notice: The UN-FAB FOUR nickname expresses the author's opinion of a perceived political alignment. Imagined scenes and dialogue are not evidence of a formal group, actual statements or coordination. Any factual labels should be read with the underlying articles and their sources. No referenced brand, performer, physician or organisation endorses this publication.

For the Health of Thorold

The health of a city depends on your vote. Get the best advice you can, weigh the record, and make your own decision. So here it goes...

Enjoy the satire. Read the articles behind it.
